The Criminal Justice program seeks to prepare majors for a variety of careers by fostering the knowledge and skills needed to be successful broadly in the field as well as the flexibility and depth needed for success in individual positions. Public sector opportunities such as law enforcement – at the community, state, national or international level – encompass uniquely meaningful and engaging ways to serve the common good, strengthen society, and provide compassionate support for individuals. Employment in the public sector offers positive personal incentives as well, as law enforcement and public safety positions generally offer stability, decent pay, decent benefits, and retirement.

Job Market

While criminal justice graduates often enter the workforce as police officers, the prospects for expanded opportunities are vast. A criminal justice degree can also prepare a student for careers in, probation, asset management, crime scene investigation, corporate security, corrections administration, federal protective services, or corporate loss prevention. Additional education may be required for some career paths. A criminal justice degree can also serve as a pre-law degree and the basis of a criminal law career.

Job Outlook

The U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics expects employment for people with criminal justice degrees to increase by 7% yearly through 2026. There are currently almost 810,000 jobs in criminal justice in the United States. The continued need for public safety is expected to lead to new openings for criminal justice graduates, although demand may vary by location.

Earnings

Earnings will vary by job and region. Entry pay for criminal justice officers is expected to be $50,000 to $54,000. Bureau of Labor reports for median pay in advanced criminal justice positions includes: criminal justice officers in the federal government, $84,660; detectives and criminal investigators, $79,970; police and sheriff's patrol officers, $61,050. Bilingual officers are especially sought after, and some police departments offer extra pay for bilingual abilities.
